LEARNING PATIENCE TAKES TIME

They say patience is a virtue... in fact, patience is learned over time even if some parents don't do well on this at first. But, with a little effort, any parent can learn to be patient and to amuse themselves over some situations that not so long ago annoyed them.

First you have to learn to have patience with yourself. Don't blame yourself for everything and show tolerance. Don't raise your voice and impose your wills with a calm but firm tone, no matter the problem.

Children sometimes seem to test the limits of their parents' patience. If you feel like this is what your little one does, ask yourself "what might push them to this?" Maybe they're trying to cover some frustration, or wants revenge for a moment when you were unfair. Or maybe your child just feels neglected and is only trying to get your attention.

To make your child become a patient person you can:

- Play games that require taking turns - this will teach them to wait until their turn comes.
- Read thick books and long stories, leaving to follow-up for the next evening. Do not give in to pleading to find out the ending that evening.
- Teach them to plant a tree or to take care of a flower - they will learn to be patient until they see the results of their work.
- If a child wants a bike, give a little money at a time, and tell them to save. Your child will learn to have patience and, at the same time, the value of money.

"If there must be trouble, let it be in my day, that my child may have peace."

- Thomas Paine

"The pessimist borrows trouble; the optimist lends encouragement."

- William Arthur Ward

"Most misfortunes are the results of misused time."

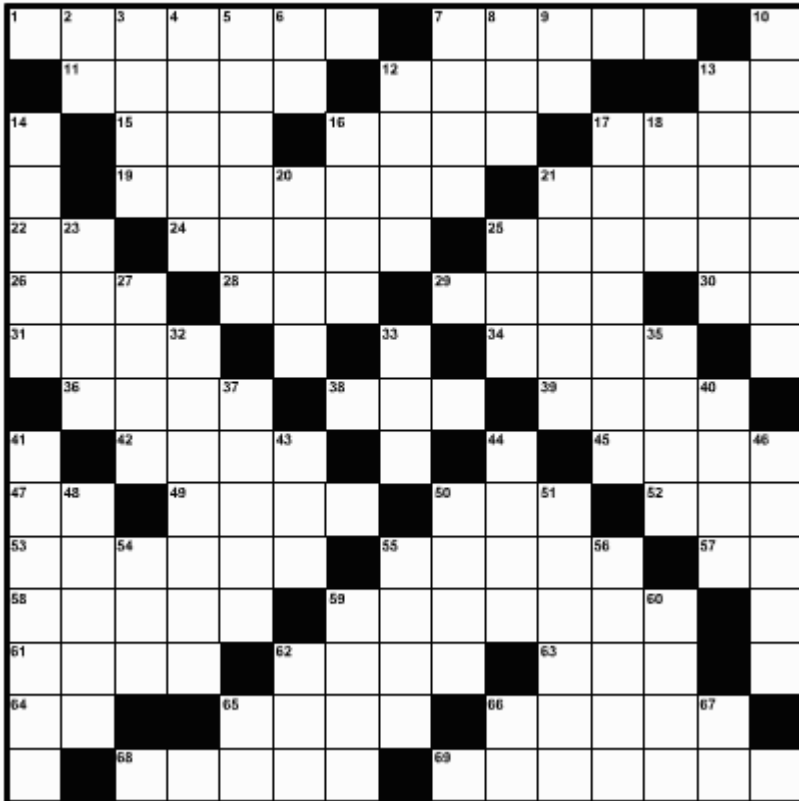

- Napoleon Hill

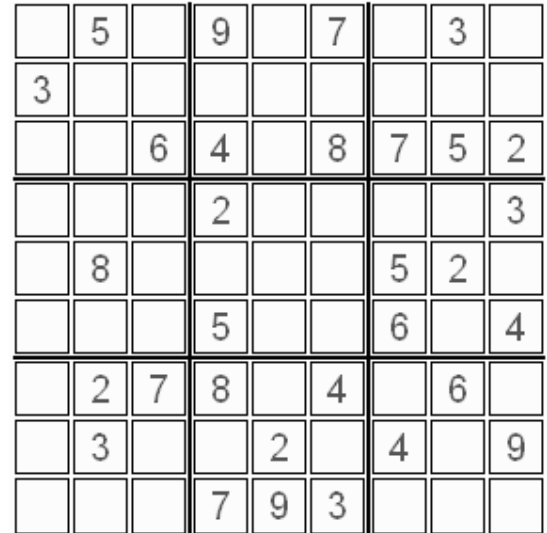

"Go outside and play, but stay out of the sandbox. You know what that does to your cell phone."
